

Reflection

By: Katherine Colucci

The world is like a mirror,
in the way we see each other,
the way we self-reflect,
and the way we're taught to show respect.

We only see a person's cover,
not how they act with one another.
It's never about their story and content,
to others, all of that is irrelevant.

We look inside ourselves and always try to change,
for the better, for the worse, or for a past mistake.
It may involve how we act, what we want or "need,"
it could create a nasty person, or resolve another's greed.

A mother and father raise a child with the best intent,
whether that child is polite, rude, or is shown discontent.
Yet a child can become quite different from their elders,
and defy their family, not for the better.

The world is filled with people of all types,
some nasty, some caring, some selfish, some kind.
Yet their reflection can tell opposing stories,
some truthful, while others of facades and false glories.

To learn of one's true inner self, a mirror is no way to go,
for it only brings out opinions, most to be stereotypical.
The way one sees others, itself and shows their life to be,
is like a mirror, it will never reveal their true morality.
